S. Maruti Rao Cigarette smoking and natural killer cells. Cigarette smoking has been associated with alterations of immunologic and inflammatory responses. Recent evidence has shown a role for natural killer (NK) cells in the pathogenesis of lung disease. This study was undertaken to examine the effect of cigarette smoking on NK cell activity. NK cell activity was assessed in the peripheral blood of a group of 57 chronic smokers and 20 nonsmokers. NK cell function was determined by measuring lytic activity of peripheral blood mononuclear cells after stimulation with K562 tumor cells. Blood samples were obtained from smokers and nonsmokers and tested for NK activity in the presence or absence of blood plasma from the same individuals. NK cell activity was found to be inversely related to the number of cigarettes smoked. The effect of plasma was greatest in the nonsmokers. NK cell activity was increased in the absence of plasma in the nonsmokers only. The authors conclude that
